[< AS. sendan, send.]
Syn.: cast, delegate, depute, discharge, dispatch, dismiss, emit, fling, forward, hurl, impel, lance, launch, project, propel, sling, throw, transmit. Send in its most common use involves personal efficiency without personal presence; according to the adage, "If you want your business done, go; if not, send"; one sends a letter or a bullet, a messenger or a message. In all the derived uses this same idea controls: if one sends a ball into his own heart, the action is away from the directing hand, and he is viewed as the passive recipient of his own act; it is with an approach to personification that we speak of the bow sending the arrow or the gun the shot. To dispatch is to send hastily or very promptly, ordinarily with a destination in view; to dismiss is to send away from oneself without reference to a destination; as, to dismiss a clerk, an application, or an annoying subject. To discharge is to send away so as to relieve a person or thing of a load; we discharge a gun or discharge the contents; as applied to persons, discharge is a harsher term than dismiss. To emit is to send forth from within, with no reference to a destination; as, the sun emits light and heat. Transmit, from the Latin, is a dignified term, often less vigorous than the Saxon send, but preferable at times in liteeary or scientific use; as, to transmit the crown, or the feud, from generation to generation; to transmit a charge of electricity. Transmit fixes the attention more on the intervening agency, as send does upon the points of departure and destination.—Ant.: bring, carry, convey, get, give, hand, hold, keep, receive, retain.—Prep.: to send from the hand to or toward (rarely at) a mark; send to a friend by a messenger or by mail; send a person into banishment; send a shell among the enemy.—to send for, to summon by a message or messenger.—to send in one's papers, to resign.—send'er, n.

[F., < L. sensatus, intelligent.] Syn.: emotion, feeling, perception, sense. Sensation is the mind's consciousness due to a bodily affection as of heat or cold; perception is the cognition of some external object which is the cause or occasion of the sensation; the sensation of heat may be connected with the perception of a fire. While sensations are connected with the body, emotions, as joy, grief, etc., are wholly of the mind. "As the most of them [the sensations] are positively agreeable or the opposite, they are nearly akin to those emotions, as hope or terror, or those passions, as anger and envy, which are acknowledged by all to belong exclusively to the spirit, and to involve no relation whatever to matter or the bodily organism. Such feelings are not infrequently styled sensations, though improperly." PORTER Human Intellect § 112, p. 128. Feeling is a term popularly denoting what is felt, whether through the body or by the mind alone, and includes both sensation and emotion. A sense is an organ or faculty of sensation or of perception. See FEELING.—sen-sa'tion-al, a. 1. Pertaining to emotional excitement. 2. Pertaining to physical sensation. 3. Causing unnatural emotional excitement; melodramatic; trashy.

Syn.: sensitiveness, sensibility. Sensibility, in the philosophical sense, denotes the capacity of emotion or feeling as distinguished from the intellect and the will. (Compare synonyms for SENSATION.) In popular use sensibility denotes sometimes capacity of feeling of any kind; as, sensibility to heat or cold; sometimes, a peculiar readiness to be the subject of feeling, especially of the higher feelings; as, the sensibility of the artist or the poet; a person of great or fine sensibility. Sensitiveness denotes an especial delicacy of sensibility, ready to be excited by the slightest cause, as displayed, for instance, in the sensitive-plant. Susceptibility is rather a capacity to take up, receive, and, as it were, to contain feeling, so that a person of great susceptibility is capable of being not only readily but deeply moved; sensitiveness is more superficial, susceptibility more pervading. Thus, in physics, the sensitiveness of a magnetic needle is the ease with which it may be deflected, as by another magnet; its susceptibility is the degree to which it can be magnetized by a given magnetic force or the amount of magnetism it will hold. So a person of great sensitiveness is quickly and keenly affected by any external influence, as by music, pathos, or ridicule, while a person of great susceptibility is not only touched, but moved to his utmost soul. See FEELING.—Ant.: coldness, deadness, hardness, insensibility, numbness, unconsciousness.

Chemical Signs.

In chemistry, the elements are represented by accepted abbreviations, called symbols, each of which indicates a single atom of the element. (See table under ELEMENT.) When more than one atom is to be represented, figures are placed to the right of the symbol either above or below the line; thus, O^3, or O_3. A molecule representing a compound is indicated by a series of such symbols called a formula; thus, alcohol has for its formula C_2H_6O, which shows that a molecule of this substance contains two atoms of carbon, six of hydrogen, and one of oxygen. To indicate more than one molecule, various expedients are used; thus, each of the groups of symbols 2HCl, 2(HCl), and $(HCl)_2$, stands for two molecules of hydrochloric acid.

The atoms of a group within a molecule are frequently separated from others by means of periods or commas, especially in complex formulas; thus, alcohol may be represented as $C_2H_5.HO$, or C_2H_5,HO, instead of C_2H_6O, and the formula of sulfuric acid was formerly written $H_2O.SO_3$, or SO_3,H_2O, instead of H_2SO_4.

In chemical reactions, the signs + (plus) and − (minus) are used to show that the formulas so connected are necessary to produce a desired reaction, and the results are usually shown as immediately following the sign = (equals), indicating that the original groups have reacted to produce a new compound; thus, the action of sulfuric acid on zinc, formerly indicated by the symbols $Zn + SO_3.H_2O = ZnO.SO_3 + H_2$, and now by $Zn + H_2SO_4 = ZnSO_4 + H_2$, shows in the latter case that one molecule of sulfuric acid acting on one molecule of zinc yields one molecule of zinc sulfate and one of hydrogen. The sign + (plus) is used above an initial representing an organic base as an alkaloid, to show that it is electropositive; thus, Ā signifies atropin. A minus-sign or dash over the initial letter of an organic acid is commonly used as an abbreviation; thus, the formula for tartaric acid, $H_2(C_4H_4O_6)$, may be abbreviated to T̄.

Valence, or combining power, may be represented by prime-marks or Roman numerals: thus, Ca'' or Ca^{II} shows that calcium is bivalent; Bi''' or Bi^{III} that bismuth is trivalent. In graphic formulas straight dashes, each of which signifies a single unit of affinity, and which, when they connect two symbols, are called bonds, serve to indicate chemical union or saturation; thus, H — | indicates univalent hydrogen, O —, — O —, or O = indicates bivalent oxygen, Bi≡ indicates trivalent bismuth, and so on. (The position of the lines is determined merely by convenience.) By means of these graphic formulas the constitution of very complex bodies may be expressed, especially in organic chemistry. The so-called benzene ring, sometimes condensed into represents C_6H_6. Correspondingly, in this any one of the hydrogen atoms may be substituted by a monovalent group, or two hydrogen atoms by a bivalent group, etc. In thermochemistry a superior c (°), signifying calories, is used in exothermic reactions to represent the heat-units evolved in the combination of the elements. When the reaction is endothermic, a minus-sign is used before the number of calories..

To say, "The Hudson is like the Rhine" is not simile, but direct and literal comparison; but to say, "The Hudson flows like the march of time" is to lift the river out of its class and associate it with a great elemental conception, and thus to transform the comparison into a simile. Similitude is broader in meaning than simile or metaphor, and may include direct and literal comparison. "All unrighteousness is sin." 1 John v, 17. Transgression, as its etymology indicates, is the stepping over a specific enactment, whether of God or man, ordinarily by overt act, but in the broadest sense in volition or desire. Sin may be either act or state; transgression is always an act, mental or physical. Crime is often used for a flagrant violation of right, but in the technical sense denotes specific violation of human law. Guilt is desert of and exposure to punishment because of sin. Depravity denotes no act, but a perverted moral condition from which any act of sin may proceed. Sin in the generic sense, as denoting a state of heart, is synonymous with depravity; in the specific sense, as in the expression a sin, or in the plural sins, the term is synonymous with transgression or *transgressions. The crusaders called all Mohammedans infidels, and were so called by them in return; the word is commonly applied to any decided opponent of an accepted religion. Syn.: brief, delineation, draft, drawing, outline, picture, plan, skeleton. An outline gives only the bounding or determining lines of a figure or a scene; a sketch may give not only lines, but shading and color, but is hasty and incomplete. The lines of a sketch are seldom so full and continuous as those of an outline. Draft and plan apply especially to mechanical drawing, of which outline, sketch, and drawing are also used; a plan is strictly a view from above, as of a building or machine, giving the lines of a horizontal section, originally at the level of the ground, now in a wider sense at any height; as, a plan of the cellar; a plan of the attic. A design is such a preliminary sketch as indicates the object to be accomplished or the result to be attained, and is understood to be original. One may make a drawing of any well-known mechanism, or a drawing from another man's design; but if he says "the design is mine," he claims it as his own invention or composition. In written composition an outline gives simply the main divisions, and is often called a skeleton; a somewhat fuller suggestion of illustration, treatment, and style is given in a sketch. A lawyer's brief is a succinct statement of the main facts in a case, and of the main heads of his argument on points of law, with references to authorities. Syn.: aroma, bouquet, fragrance, odor, perfume, savor, scent, stench, stink. Smell is the generic word including all the rest. Aroma, fragrance, and perfume are ordinarily pleasing; odor, savor, and scent may be so. Odor is nearly synonymous with smell, but is susceptible of more delicate use; as, the odor of incense., An aroma is a delicate and spicy odor, as of fine coffee; bouquet is said chiefly of the delicate odor of certain wines. We speak of the fragrance or perfume of flowers, but fragrance is more delicate; a perfume may be so strong and rich as to be repulsive by excess. There is a tendency to restrict the application of perfume to the artificial preparations called collectively "perfumery." Scent is chiefly used for the characteristic odor of an animal by which it is tracked or avoided by other animals: the word is also applied to any odor, natural or artificial, especially when faintly diffused through the air; as, the scent of mignonette or of new-mown hay. Savor is chiefly said of the appetizing odor evolved from articles of food by the processes of cooking. Any smell that is at once foul, strong, and pervasive may be called a stench. Smell and scent denote also the sense to which odors appeal; as, man has the sense of smell; the keen scent of the foxhound. Syn.: mind, spirit. The soul includes the intellect, sensibilities, and will; beyond what is expressed by the word mind, the soul denotes especially the moral, the immortal nature; we say of a dead body, the soul (not the mind) has fled. Spirit is used especially in contradistinction from matter; it may in many cases be substituted for soul, but soul has commonly a fuller and more determinate meaning; we can conceive of spirits as having no moral nature; the fairies, elves, and brownies of mythology might be termed spirits, but not souls. In the figurative sense, spirit denotes animation, excitability, perhaps impatience; as, a lad of spirit; he sang with spirit; he replied with spirit. Soul denotes energy and depth of feeling, as when we speak of soulful eyes; or it may denote the very life of anything; as, the soul of harmony. [< F. son, < L. sonus, sound.]

Syn.: noise, note, tone. Sound is the most comprehensive word, applying to anything that is audible. Tone is sound considered as having some musical quality or as expressive of some feeling; noise is sound considered without reference to musical quality or as distinctly unmusical or discordant. Noise and sound scarcely differ, and we say almost indifferently "I heard a sound" or "I heard a noise." We speak of a fine, musical, or pleasing sound, but never thus of a noise. In music, tone may denote either a musical sound or the interval between two such sounds, but in the most careful usage the latter is now distinguished as the "interval," leaving tone to stand only for the sound. Note in music strictly denotes the character representing a sound, but in loose popular usage it denotes the sound also, and becomes practically equivalent to tone. Aside from its musical use, tone is chiefly applied to that quality of the human voice by which feeling is expressed: as, he spoke in a cheery tone; the word is similarly applied to the voices of birds and other animals, and sometimes to inanimate objects. As used of a musical instrument, tone denotes the general quality of its sounds collectively considered. To color is to impart a color desired or undesired, temporary or permanent, or, in the intransitive use, to assume a color in any way; as, he colored with shame and vexation. To dye is to impart a color intentionally and with a view to permanence, and especially so as to pervade the substance or fiber of that to which it is applied. Syn.: abstract, commit larceny, commit theft, embezzle, extort, filch, filch, pilfer, pillage, plunder, purloin, rob, swindle. To commit larceny is to take and carry away the personal property of another with felonious intent. To commit theft (more commonly with the indefinite article, to commit a theft) has the same general meaning, but is not a common phrase in legal use. To steal is, in law, to commit simple larceny; but the word may be applied to any furtive, covert, or surreptitious taking of anything, whether material or immaterial. To pilfer is to steal petty articles. The word filch especially emphasizes the secrecy and slyness of the act: filch is ordinarily applied to things of little value, but may apply to the most precious, as in Shakespeare, "he that filches from me my good name." To purloin is etymologically to carry far away, and is commonly applied to the dishonest removal of articles of value or importance. To rob is, in law, to take feloniously from the person by force or fear, as in highway robbery; in a more extended use it is applied to the felonious taking of articles of value from places as well as persons, generally with suggestion of force and violence. To abstract is to take secretly and feloniously from among other things belonging to another. To embezzle is to appropriate fraudulently to oneself funds received and held in trust. To swindle is to cheat grossly, commonly by false pretenses, but is not a recognized legal offense under that name; one form of swindling, the "obtaining money by false pretenses," is an indictable offense, but much swindling may be carried on under the forms of law. To plunder is to take property from an enemy in time of war, and is not a crime at law. A mountain, as a mass of certain size, contour, color, etc., is an objective fact; the impression our mind receives, the mental picture it forms of the mountain, is subjective. But this subjective impression may become itself the object of thought (called "subject-object"), as when we compare our mental picture of the mountain with our idea of a plain or river. The direct experiences of the soul, as joy, grief, hope, fear, are purely subjective; the outward causes of these experiences, as prosperity, bereavement, disappointment, are objective. Different individuals may receive different subjective impressions from the same objective fact, that which to one is a cause of hope being to another a cause of fear, etc. The style of a writer is called objective when it derives its materials mainly from or reaches out toward external objects; it is called subjective when it derives its materials from or constantly tends to revert to the personal experience of the author. See SUGGESTIBILITY, 1.

Syn.: hint, innuendo, insinuation, intimation. A suggestion brings something before the mind less directly than by formal or explicit statement, as by a partial statement, an incidental allusion, an illustration, a question, or the like. Suggestion is often used of an unobtrusive statement of one's views or wishes to another, leaving consideration and any consequent action entirely to that person's judgment, and is hence, in many cases, the most respectful way in which to convey one's views to a superior or a stranger. A suggestion may be given unintentionally and even unconsciously, as when we say an author has "a suggestive style." An intimation is a suggestion in brief utterance, or sometimes by significant act, gesture, or token, of one's meaning or wishes; in the latter case it is often the act of a superior; as, God in his providence gives us intimations of his will. A hint is still more limited in expression, and is always covert, but frequently with good intent; as, to give one a hint of danger or of opportunity. Insinuation and innuendo are used in the bad sense; an insinuation is a covert or partly veiled injurious utterance, sometimes to the very person attacked; an innuendo is commonly secret as well as sly, as if pointing one out for opprobrium. Some hold that a miracle, as the raising of the dead, is a direct suspension and even violation of natural laws by the fiat of the Creator, and so is supernatural; others hold that the miracle is simply the calling forth of a power residing in the laws of nature, but not within their ordinary operation, and dependent on a distinct act of God, so that the miraculous might be termed "extranatural," rather than supernatural. All that is beyond human power is superhuman; as, prophecy gives evidence of superhuman knowledge; the word is sometimes applied to remarkable manifestations of human power, surpassing all that is ordinary.—Ant.: common, natural, ordinary, usual.

Syn.: bear, carry, hold up, keep up, maintain, prop, sustain, uphold. Support and sustain alike signify to hold up or keep up, to prevent from falling or sinking; but sustain has a special sense of continuous exertion or strength, as when we speak of sustained endeavor or a sustained note; a flower is supported by the stem or a temple-roof by arches; the foundations of a great building sustain an enormous pressure; to sustain life implies a greater exigency and need than to support life; to say one is sustained under affliction is to say more both of the severity of the trial and the completeness of the upholding than if we say he is supported. To bear is the most general word, denoting all holding up or keeping up of any object, whether in rest or motion; in the derived senses it refers to something that is a tax upon strength or endurance; as, to bear a strain; to bear pain or grief. To maintain is to keep in a state or condition, especially in an excellent and desirable condition; as, to maintain health or reputation; to maintain one's position; to maintain a cause or proposition is to hold it against opposition or difficulty. To support may be partial, to maintain is complete; maintain is a word of more dignity than support; a man supports his family; a state maintains an army or navy. To prop is always partial, signifying to add support to something that is insecure. See ABET; AID; ENDURE; KEEP; LEAN; LIVE; PROP.—Ant.: abandon, betray, break down, cast down, demolish, desert, destroy, drop, let go, overthrow, throw down, wreck.—Prep.: the roof is supported by, on, or upon pillars; the family was supported on or upon a pittance, or by charity.

Syn.: alike, correspondent, corresponding, equivalent, identical, interchangeable, like, same, similar, synonymic. In the strictest sense, synonymous words scarcely exist; rarely, if ever, are any two words in any language equivalent or identical in meaning; where a difference in meaning can not be easily shown, a difference in usage commonly exists, so that the words are not interchangeable. By synonymous words we usually understand words that coincide or nearly coincide in some part of their meaning, and may hence within certain limits be used interchangeably, while outside of these limits they may differ very greatly in meaning and use. It is the office of a work on synonyms to point out these correspondences and differences, that language may have the flexibility that comes from freedom of selection within the common limits, with the perspicuity and precision that result from exact choice of the fittest word to express each shade of meaning outside of the common limits. To consider synonymous words identical is fatal to accuracy; to forget that they are similar, to some extent equivalent, and sometimes interchangeable, is destructive of freedom and variety.—sy-non'y-mous-ly, adv.—sy-non'y-my, n. [-MIES², pl.] 1. The quality of being synonymous; the expressing or extending of an idea by the use of synonyms. 2. A system of synonyms; systematic collection and study of synonyms; the use and nice discrimination of synonyms. 3. A book treating of or discriminating the meaning of synonyms or of allied terms. 4. A list or collection of synonyms, as in scientific nomenclature. syn"o-nym'ics‡.

SYN.: artistic, chaste, dainty, delicate, delicious, elegant, esthetic, esthetical, exquisite, fastidious, fine, nice, tasty. That which is elegant is made so not merely by nature, but by art and culture; a woodland dell may be beautiful or picturesque, but would not ordinarily be termed elegant. Tasteful refers to that in which the element of taste is more prominent, standing, as it were, more by itself, while in elegant it is blended as part of the whole. Tasty is an inferior word, used colloquially in a similar sense. Chaste (primarily pure) denotes in literature and art that which is true to the higher and finer feelings and free from all excess or meretricious ornament. Dainty and delicate refer to the lighter and finer elements of taste and beauty, dainty tending in personal use to an excessive scrupulousness which is more fully expressed by fastidious. Nice and delicate both refer to exact adaptation to some standard; as regards matters of taste, delicate is a higher and more discriminating word than nice, and is always used in a favorable sense; a delicate distinction is one worth observing; a nice distinction may be so, or may be overstrained and unduly subtle; fine in such use is closely similar to delicate and nice, but (while capable of an unfavorable sense) has commonly a suggestion of positive excellence or admirableness; a fine touch does something; fine perceptions are to some purpose; delicate is capable of the single unfavorable sense of frail or fragile: as, a delicate constitution. Esthetic or esthetical refers to beauty or the appreciation of the beautiful, especially from the philosophic point of view. Exquisite denotes the utmost perfection of the elegant in minute details; we speak of an elegant garment, an exquisite lace. Exquisite is also applied to intense keenness of any feeling; as, exquisite delight; exquisite pain. Syn.: article, condition, expression, member, name, phrase, word. Term in its figurative uses always retains something of its literal sense of a boundary or limit. The articles of a contract or other instrument are simply the portions into which it is divided for convenience; the terms are the essential statements on which its validity depends—as it were, the landmarks of its meaning or power; a condition is a contingent term, which may become fixed upon the happening of some contemplated event. In logic a term is one of the essential members of a proposition, the boundary of statement in some one direction. Thus in general use term is more restricted than word, expression, or phrase; a term is a word that limits meaning to a fixed point of statement or to a special class of subjects; as, when we speak of the definition of terms, that is of the key-words in any discussion; or we say "that is a legal or scientific term." See BOUNDARY; DICTION. —term'/day", n. A designated day. th. A digraph assumed in English from the common spelling. It is the sign of the elementary sound closing in pith, myth, opening in thin, think, and is represented in the common spelling by (1) th initial as in thank, thumb, etc.; (2) th medial in words not Anglo-Saxon, as author, method, panther; (3) th final as in bath, birth, length, breadth, width, etc. In some American and English names, and French words and names, the h is silent. See THOMAS. In English th stands for two sounds: (1) th in think, which foreigners often call tink, (2) th in then, which they call den. In indicating the pronunciations in this book th or th is used to indicate the first sound, and th or th is used to indicate the second according to the keys used. If the words then, they, thy, are carefully pronounced and listened to, a vocal murmur will be heard with the opening consonant, like the murmur heard with d in den, day, die, while in think, thin, there is no such murmur, but the opening sound is atonic like t in tink. English th often represents Greek θ, which was an aspirated t (somewhat as in hothouse). The Romans wrote it th, and then dropped the aspiration; so that, in medieval Latin as in the Romance languages, th is simply another way of writing t. Italian and Spanish have discarded this th with the t sound, but French keeps it.

-th, suffix. In (1) abstract nouns, as health, wealth; (2) ordinals, as fourth, fifth; and (3) the third person singular of the present indicative of verbs, as doth, hath. This suffix is a voiceless consonant except in the plural forms of some nouns which change it to voiced: as, path (1 pəth; 2 păth), paths (1 pəthz; 2 păthz). [(1) < AS. -th, -t. (2) < AS. -tha, -the. (3) < AS. -eth, -ath.]

Syn.: accordingly, because, consequently, hence, since, then, thence, whence, wherefore. Therefore is the most precise and formal word for expressing the direct conclusion of a chain of reasoning; then carries a similar but slighter sense of inference, which it gives incidentally rather than formally; as, "All men are mortal; Cæsar is a man; therefore Cæsar is mortal"; or, "The contract is awarded; then there is no more to be said." Consequently denotes a direct result, but more frequently of a practical than a theoretical kind; as, "Important matters demand my attention; consequently I shall not sail to-day." Consequently is rarely used in the formal conclusions of logic or mathematics, but marks rather the freer and looser style of rhetorical argument. Accordingly denotes correspondence, which may or may not be consequence; it is often used in narration; as, "The soldiers were eager and confident; accordingly they sprang forward at the word of command." Thence is a word of more sweeping inference than therefore, applying not merely to a single set or premises, but often to all that has gone before, including the reasonable inferences that have not been formally stated. Wherefore is the correlative of therefore, and whence of hence or thence, appending the inference or conclusion to the previous statement without a break. The Four Principal Thermometers Compared.

ther-mom'e-ter, 1 thər-mom'-ɪ-tər; 2 ther-mŏm'e-ter, n. An instrument for measuring temperature. See TEMPERATURE.

Thermometers usually act upon the principle that change of temperature causes greater alteration in the dimensions of one body than of another; the ordinary glass thermometer consists of a capillary tube or stem with bulb containing mercury which expands or contracts as the temperature rises or falls. In the Réaumur scale the freezing-point is marked zero and the space between this and boiling-point is divided into 80 degrees. In the Centigrade scale the freezing-point is zero and the boiling-point 100 degrees. The original Celsius scale (in disuse) is the reverse of this. In the Fahrenheit scale the freezing-point is 32° and the boiling-point 212°. To reduce degrees of one scale to those of another, the following formulas will serve, the initial letters representing the respective scales:

F = 9/5 C+32 = 9/4 R+32
C = 5/9 (F −32) = 5/4 R
R = 4/9 (F −32) = 4/5 C

At the International Meridian Congress 1884, the meridian of Greenwich, England, was taken as a prime meridian and 24 standard meridians differing from it by 15° of longitude, east and west, were established. In America the standard times are: Atlantic, Colonial or Intercolonial (Provincial), 60° W. or 4 hours slower than Greenwich, used in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; Eastern, 75° W. or 5 hours slower; Central, 90° W. or 6 hours slower; Mountain, 105° W. or 7 hours slower; Pacific, 120° W. or 8 hours slower than Greenwich. These times had already been in use by the railways of the United States and Canada since 1883, changes from one standard to another being made at the more prominent railway stations. The standard time for India follows meridian 82° 30′ E. or 5½ hours fast, while Japan takes meridian 135° E. or 9 hours fast. In Australia the standard time for Western Australia follows meridian 120° E. or 8 hours fast; South Australia, meridian 142° 30′ E. or 9½ hours fast; New South Wales, Queensland, Victoria, and Tasmania, 150° E. or 10 hours fast; New Zealand, 172° 30′ E. or 11½ hours fast. Longitude 180° practically coincides with the international date-line, where, according to direction of passage, the date is set ahead or back one whole day. As the meridian of New York is 74° W., the local time of New York is 4 hours 56 minutes slower than Greenwich time. The following list shows the local times of various capitals and other important cities of the world when it is noon (local time) in New York:

To tire is to reduce one's strength in any degree by exertion; one may be tired just enough to make rest pleasant, or even unconsciously tired, becoming aware of the fact only when he ceases the exertion; or, on the other hand, he may be, according to the common phrase, "too tired to stir"; but for this extreme condition the stronger words are commonly used. One who is fatigued suffers from a conscious and painful lack of strength as the result of some overtaxing; an invalid may be fatigued with very slight exertion; when one is wearied, the painful lack of strength is the result of long-continued demand or strain; one is exhausted when the strain has been so severe and continuous as utterly to consume the strength, so that further exertion is for the time impossible. One is jagged by drudgery; he is jaded by incessant repetition of the same act until it becomes increasingly difficult or well-nigh impossible; as, a horse is jaded by a long and unbroken journey.
